- 464 Letters
On Spiotto's study of the exclusionary rule
- 465 An introduction to this issue
- Larry Berkson 466 The U.S. Circuit Judge Nominating Commission: the candidates' perspective
Many of the first 74 candidates recommended to the President are satisfied that the new nominating process is fair and impartial, according to a recent survey.
- Robert J. Lipshutz and Douglas B. Huron 483 Achieving a more representative federal judiciary
Through a combination of merit selection and affirmative action, President Carter will make the federal bench more inclusive and well-qualified, two of his advisors argue.
- Katherine Randall 486 The success of affirmative action in the Sixth Circuit
Here's how one of the 11 circuit judge panels responded to the President's call for more women and minorities on the bench.
- Sheldon Goldman 488 Should there be affirmative action for the judiciary?
Special efforts to find qualified women and minorities for the federal bench are not incompatible with merit selection because they ensure that we choose the "best" judges from among all possible candidates.
- Peter G. Fish 495 Evaluating the black judicial applicant
Blacks can achieve a fair share of the new judgeships, but only if the panels clear the road of several obstacles which affect blacks more than whites.
- Elliot E. Slotnick 502 The changing role of the Senate Judiciary Committee in judicial selection
Under Senator Edward Kennedy, the judiciary committee appears ready to make its own evaluation of the President's judicial nominees—and perhaps alter the historic 'blue slip' process.
