- Irene A. Tesitor* 204 An introduction to this issue
- William O. Jenkins* 206 Two of Michigan's worst judges—and what their cases teach
Though the cases of James Del Rio and Willard Mikesell were not typical, they clearly demonstrate the value of a disciplinary system and the painstaking way that commissions actually work.
- Stanley Anderson* 220 A call for more openness in the California Commission on Judicial Performance.
Now that the commission has proven its value, it should begin publicizing more of its actions to strengthen public confidence.
- Robert J. Martineau* 227 The educational role of judicial conduct organizations
What commissions can do to promote understanding of the disciplinary system.
- Rubin G. Cohn* 232 The limited due process rights of judges in disciplinary proceedings
Judges accused of misconduct are not entitled to all the procedural rights of a criminal defendant, courts have ruled, because the sanctions that commissions impose are 'administrative,' not punitive, in nature.
- Rubin G. Cohn* 244 Comparing one- and two-tier systems
- Ann Devroy* 249 A reporter's notes on the Boston conference
A reporter who attended the Boston Workshop for Disciplinary Commission Staff says that commissioners sometimes seem to be more in tune with judges than with the public.
