308 Letters

On merit selection and six-member juries.

Deborah A. Bagg

-309 What the Devitt Committee recommends to improve advocacy in federal courts

In its final report, the committee suggested bar exams, trial experience requirements, and peer review for lawyers who practice in federal courts. But critics contend some of the proposals won't make any difference.

Dean L. Yarwood
and Bradley C. Canon

-322 On the Supreme Court's annual trek to the Capitol

A sidelight on how the justices make their appeal to Congress each year for the high court's appropriation.

Henry R. Glick

-328 The judicial 'firm': a useful model for understanding decision-making in a juvenile court

A juvenile court resembles what theorists call a 'firm': the same people work together regularly, they agree strongly on their common goals, and no one usually wants to 'rock the boat.'

Jeffrey A. Parness and Christopher C. Manthey

-338 Public process in state court rulemaking

Because court rules can significantly affect many different groups in society, each of them should have a chance to participate in the rulemaking process.
