Is there no alternative to the hard line in juvenile justice?
- Jon Gottschall 164 Carter's judicial appointments: the influence of affirmative action and merit selection on voting on the U.S. Courts of Appeals
As predicted, Carter's appeals court appointees are having a liberal influence. However, they do not differ significantly in their voting behavior from judges appointed by previous Democratic administrations.
- Harriet Pollack and Alexander B. Smith 174 White-collar v. street crime sentencing disparity: how judges see the problem
A survey of judges indicates that while each judge has generally defined white-collar crime and resolved the problem of sentencing to his or her own satisfaction, there are considerable differences among them as to solutions.
- Stephen B. Burbank 183 The federal judicial discipline act: is decentralized self-regulation working?
It will take years for a comprehensive assessment of self-regulation under the act. But isn't it time for the judicial councils to specify what procedures they will follow in handling complaints against judges?
