RESEARCH

The Impact of Victim-Offender Mediation:
A Cross-National Perspective 215

Mark S. Umbreit, Robert B. Coates, Ann Warner Roberts

In an effort to examine the scope and impact of victim-offender mediation programs, the authors conducted a research project that examined the range of programs and practices in the United States, Canada, and England.

Examining and Responding to Conflict Between African American and Jewish American Students on a College Campus 231

Warren J. Blumenfeld, Lisa D. Robinson

The authors describe a research project to investigate the nature of the relationship between African American and Jewish American students; they present the results of their study and the design of a course developed to improve relations between these groups.

PRACTICE

What It Means to Be Sorry: The Power of Apology in Mediation 265

Carl D. Schneider

The role of apology in divorce mediation is often alluded to but seldom explored in depth. The author considers whether and how mediators might invite and support opportunities for apology.

The Party of the Last Part: Ethical and Process Implications for Children in Divorce Mediation 281

Bruce Menin

How mediators respond to the challenge of maintaining neutrality while responding to the needs of children of divorcing parents continues to stir controversy and debate. In this article, the author suggests process options for mediators to ensure that children's needs are addressed.

THEORY

Relational Transformation in Mediation: Following Constitutive and Regulative Rules

295

Erling O. Jorgensen

In this article, the author describes how mediators can analyze and effectively employ the implicit rules that individuals use to ascribe meaning to situations and to determine action.
